Japan Glosses, China Distorts

By Edward B. Mannheim

The U.S. Japanese and Singaporean economies face a similar challenge: How to salvage already-weak domestic demand and make an adequate recovery? The challenge is the same in all three countries, but the solutions may be quite different. The United States and Japan are facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different. The United States and Japan are facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different. The United States and Japan are facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different.

The United States is facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different. The United States and Japan are facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different. The United States and Japan are facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different. The United States and Japan are facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different. The United States and Japan are facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different. The United States and Japan are facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different. The United States and Japan are facing the same condition of weak domestic demand, but the solutions may be quite different.